ABSTRACT

Electrical energy transmission system development has been insufficient during the 90’ in Argentina. An explanation could be the depressive effect of the 70% majority rule, used for new facilities decisions. Simple majority rule and vote market could allow a more efficient development of the grid. Nevertheless, the depressive rule was stated looking for new investments in the sector, putting in second place the interest of final users. More accountability from authorities to citizens would allow more efficient rules.